The strange case of these two curmides opposing winds meeting and elloging to each other in a cyclone. I was told of this provision of my uncle's will, but Mr. Newman was not. Since my uncle abused the doctors his friend defended them. I think my uncle did not dure tell Newman that he had distuberited me in case I did what he would approve. Well, my uncle was taken down with a maindy which was sure to kill him if he did not have medical attendance, and he would probably die anyway. I confess I was not anxious that he should live, but his injunction that I should not call in a doctor placed me in a very delicate position. No one authority to remind us of the little but I knew of the conditions of his will, and if it became known I would be herated by friends, neighbors and relatives for permitting the old man to die rather than oppose him by calling in medical attendance. But it was I who was to be rich or remain in poverty and not they. I omitted to call a doctor, nor did I give the real reason for not doing so-that I would lose an inheritance if I did.

As soon as it was known that my uncle was daugerously fil people began to wonder that I did not call in a doctor. Then they began to ask me the reason. When I told them my uncle would not have a doctor they all agreed that it was my duty to force one upon him. From that they passed to insinuating that I wished him to die that I might get his money. Finally threats were made that if I didn't "do my duty" word would be sent to the police that I was slowly murdering my uncle in order to possess myself of his millions. The strain became so great that I think it possible I might have yielded if his fortune would have gone to any one else than

The Value of Reserve Power,

In every department of life, physical, mental and moral reserves are of incalculable value, says Orlson Swett Marden in Success Magazine.
